CHARCOAL FIRES

Charcoal fires are harder to light than pine shavings, but for mouth-watering barbecued meals outdoors they have no equal.

Charcoal burns for a long time with a minimum of smoke. The heat is intense and even—just right for barbecueing. Starting such a fire need not be such a chore, say nutrition specialists at VPI.

Here's what they say to do:

Begin with a gravel base to permit the fire to "breathe." If your firebox is perforated you don't need the gravel, of course. Newspaper "knots" (a sheet of newspaper folded lengthwise and tied into an overhand knot) burn hot and make good starters. Put several of these knots on the floor of the firebox, light them, and cover with a pyramid of charcoal about 12 inches in diameter and three to four inches high.

Commercial starters work well, but it is possible to have a good fire without them. You can build a small wood fire, put on some charcoal and when it begins to burn, remove it and put it in the burner. When charcoal is gray all over, you're ready to use it for cooking.

To reduce flame-up when fat drips, move charcoal lumps or briquests 1-2 inch apart — and keep grates clean. The fat will run along clean rods and drop off at the ends rather than on the charcoal.
